New Englanders have a love/hate relationship with winter. We hate shoveling snow, scraping ice off the windshield and gray days with frozen mush on the ground.

Yet winter offers cleansing and warmth. A fresh blanket of snow creates a clean, crystalline landscape ripe with inviting opportunities, like skiing, snowshoeing and hiking. Despite the cold, nothing quite beats the glow of the wood stove, or the smell of the house around the holidays.

We complain about bugs all summer long and we forget to rejoice in the cold winter air when nothing but Jack Frost wants to bite you.

This edition of Around Concord explores some indoor and outdoor delights for your appreciation.

Learn how Ahmad Gazelle chooses his different glazes to make each piece of his pottery a handmade treasure.

Consider all the work – and fun – that goes into setting up your own backyard skating rink.

Read the backstory behind Maple Street Mercantile, which offers home goods and pastries from the heart of Contoocook. Did I mention fresh brewed coffee, cinnamon buns and oatmeal cream pies?

Spend some time with the words of the incomparable Mike Pride, former editor of the Monitor, whose book excerpt opens the world to the story of Civil War nurse Harriet Dame in “No Place for a Woman,” which was published before his death earlier this year.

Most of all, find something new to love about winter. Before you know it, the mud will be here.

Dickens’ ‘A Christmas Carol’

In this original adaptation of the holiday classic by Jill Pinard, Hatbox Theatre focuses on how the dream-like qualities of the ghost story aspect of Dickens’ work can bring about redemption. Is it “an undigested bit of beef” - a line in the original story – that leads Scrooge to have bad dreams or is he really being visited by ghosts intent on helping him redeem himself. Audience members, too, will wonder if they are dreaming when they are immersed in sound, lights and projections that bring out these eerier aspects of Scrooge’s fateful night. Fridays and Saturdays performances are at 7:30 p.m., Sundays performances at 2 p.m. Tickets are $25 for adults, $22 for students/seniors/members, and $19 for senior members. Visit hatboxnh.com.

Erik Hodges plays Scrooge in the Hatbox adaptation of “A Christmas Carol.”

“We constantly find ourselves surrounded by these remarkable women and it’s so easy to see how successful and driven and capable they all are. MEREDITH LEE, market owner on collaborations with other ventures
Hopkinton bakery collaborates with women entrepreneurs

By SRUTHI GOPALAKRISHNAN

Growing up in a household where the art of hosting parties and home decor held center stage, Meredith Lee saw no better venture than to open a homeware store in her beloved hometown of Hopkinton.

Lee opened Maple Street Mercantile in 2022 in the Contoocook Village, but her aspirations for the store were far grander than merely offering a place to buy seasonal dinnerware or throw pillows.

She yearned to infuse the essence of her family’s passions into her establishment. Her mother, Margie Astles, is an artist and a natural entertainer, while a lineage of chefs also runs deep in her family’s history.

Just a year after opening its doors, Lee made the inspired decision to open a bakery within the store’s rustic confines.

“The intention was always to someday have homewares mixed with food in some capacity,” explained Lee. “After crunching the numbers, we were like ‘this is what the town really wants, they want a bakery.’ ”

This establishment is not just woman-owned and family-run. The bakery sources delicious baked goods from women entrepreneurs in New Hampshire.

Homemade bagels, blondies, sugar cookies, and more come from talented women bakers at Sweet Gatherings, Buttercup Baking, and Bird Food Baking Co.

What’s exciting is that the bakery’s menu changes daily.

Working with women is an intentional choice that Lee made.

“We constantly find ourselves surrounded by these remarkable women and it’s so easy to see how successful and driven and capable they all are. They all run these businesses so successfully and I think what makes it so successful is just this energy of wanting to collaborate and see each other grow,” said Lee.

Another woman-owned business that Lee collaborates with is Witching Hour Provisions, a coffee roastery and refill store located just across the street from Maple Street Mercantile.

The coffee roastery crafted a special coffee blend exclusively for Lee’s bakery.

Alyssa McKeon, owner of Witching Hour Provisions, affectionately calls her relationship with Lee, “neighbors in life.” They have stores across the street from each other, live just houses apart and have kids of similar ages.

“It might seem counterintuitive because we’re across the street from each other,” McKeon explained. “But we never planned to serve our coffee by the cup, yet it’s a frequent request we get.”

When customers buy their coffee blends, McKeon sends them across to enjoy a cup of freshly brewed coffee and explore homewares at Lee’s store. This collaborative spirit extends throughout the town, with other businesses doing the same.

“It just shows how tight our little village is. It’s just such a lovely little community of shops, where we all send folks around to all of our shops,” said McKeon, highlighting the synergy that fuels the town.

Since the bakery opened in September, the homeware section of Lee’s store has experienced a remarkable surge in business. But that’s not the only success story here.

Lee’s store has an entryway that connects to Indigo Blues and Co., a clothing boutique.

Ever since the bakery’s launch, the next-door store has noticed a significant uptick in customer traffic, said Lee.

“To be able to give back to our fellow businesses by drawing people in and then everyone benefits from that is the best feeling. It is so rewarding,” said Lee. ◆
BOOK EXCERPT

‘NO PLACE FOR A WOMAN’

Local author Mike Pride’s final book explores role of Harriet Dame during Civil War
The summer of 1862 brought one trial after another for the Second New Hampshire Infantry. Harriet Dame was there for all of them. From the battles on the Virginia Peninsula through the regiment’s return to Bull Run, she marched and camped with the men. “Sometimes I would go several weeks without any clothes but those I had on,” she later recalled. “When we were marching, I could carry nothing but a haversack. When I could get a chance, I would go down to the creek, wash the clothes I was wearing and put them right on again without drying. There was no other way.”

After nursing the sick at Yorktown and walking among the dead on the Williamsburg battlefield with her friend Dorothea Dix, Dame rejoined her regiment at Fair Oaks before all the dead of the June 1 battle there were buried. Later, the mere thought of the stink and the green flies on that campground made her ill.

Peril always seemed near even though the rifle pits on the camp’s perimeter lay some distance from the field hospital. Typhoid, diarrhea, and dysentery sent many men to the hospital and some to their death. Doctors believed foul air carried the germs that caused these diseases, but the real culprits were the green flies that Dame loathed and bacteria from the foul water supply. The flies picked up and spread germs from fecal matter and decaying flesh. The bodies of 3,000 soldiers and scores of dead horses had been haphazardly buried on the field at Fair Oaks. This “filled the air with noxious effluvium, and the only water was infiltrated with the decaying animal matter of the battlefield,” an assistant surgeon remarked.

As the weeks passed, the men regularly encountered exposed body parts. One private awoke in his tent one morning to see a hand sticking out of the earth inches from his face. “It is very warm here now and you can judge for yourself that it ain’t a very sweet-smelling place,” Pvt. Charles E. Jewett of the Second wrote home. He doubted the armies could “lay so snug together much longer without fighting.”

Indeed, Robert E. Lee, the new Confederate commander, was plotting to exploit Union Gen. George B. McClellan’s decision to park his army in place. Lee had taken over on June 1. McClellan, who knew Lee, expected him “to be timid and irresolute in action.” With the gift of time, Lee instead built up the army protecting Richmond to 101,000 men and planned his attack. As the Union army dug in, McClellan harassed Washington for more troops, claiming that Lee’s army was even larger than it was.

On June 23, Brig. Gen. Cuvier Grover, the Second New Hampshire’s new brigade commander, led a mission into the woods beyond the Union rifle pits. As the men crawled toward the rebel picket line, the only exposed member of the brigade was Grover, who sat on his horse with his torso visible above the bushes. The men drove rebel pickets back and pushed on toward the main body of Confederate troops. Satisfied that he knew the enemy’s position and had tested its strength, Grover pulled his men back.

The Second joined a larger but similarly limited foray two days later. The men were to clear the way through a mass of trees known as Oak Grove to a staging point for an assault on Richmond. They entered a thick wood with orders to pick their way through, scatter the rebel pickets, and gain control of the open ground beyond. The regiment’s sharpshooters, including Sgt. Thomas Leaver, whom Harriet Dame had known since he was a boy, took the lead as skirmishers. “The spiteful crack of their Sharp’s rifles soon rose above the din of conflict,” a private wrote. The fighting lasted for nine hours before the three Union brigades withdrew, having suffered 626 casualties.

Dame worked at the field hospital all day, caring for many men in the open air after the tents filled. She approached her task with confidence, cleaning and bandaging open wounds to stop the bleeding. This task required lint, much of which soldier-aid groups formed by women back home had produced by fraying and scraping old linen. To induce clotting, Dame folded the lint to the proper size and spread a thin coat of astringent, a potassium compound, on one side. She pressed the lint gently into the wound and secured it with an adhesive. She gave her patients water if they could drink and food if she thought it would help them. She reassured all who were conscious. After she had done what she could, she passed many of them on to the surgeons. Because balls shattered bones, amputation was common.

At one point during the crush of work, Dame stepped away to lift a blanket that covered two dead soldiers. “My God! It is Tom Leaver,” someone heard her say. He and the other man, Cpl. George Damon, were in the regiment’s company from Concord, her hometown. Leaver had recently sworn that the body of any member of the company would be sent home for a proper funeral, but Dame’s only option was to prepare the two corpses for burial on the field. She later watched their pine caskets being lowered...
The battle at Oak Grove opened the Seven Days campaign. Lee attacked the next day at Mechanicsville and the day after that at Gaines’ Mill. To strengthen his army, he left only Gen. John B. Magruder’s thin line to defend Richmond, but demonstrations by these troops convinced McClellan he was out-manned. Had his force counterattacked on June 27, it might have captured the rebel capital.

In his battle report, Magruder wrote that McClellan was out-manned. Had his force counterattacked on June 27, it might have captured the rebel capital. The Union retreat, which McClellan described as a “change of base,” began the day after he made this demand.

When General Grover’s brigade took up arms that morning, the men of the Second New Hampshire thought they were preparing for picket duty or a turn in the trenches on the camp’s perimeter. To their surprise, they were ordered to strike their tents. As they headed away from Richmond rather than toward it, they saw that Union artillery crews had already left. They had left their camp to the enemy.

Dame was surprised too. She saw the movement for what it was, describing McClellan’s army as “On Skedaddle.” The order of Gen. Joseph Hooker, the division commander, to leave behind all sick men who could not march alarmed her. “The outlook was disastrous,” she later said. “Before us lay unknown dangers, behind us an insatiable encroaching enemy, and in our presence death and suffering in the saddest phase.” When many lame men vowed to walk with the retreating army, Dame decided to lead them. Col. Gilman Marston of the Second warned her that anything loaded onto the wagons “would never be seen again.” She and the stewards could not carry all the medicines or her personal belongings, but she took what she could.

Because it was summer with temperatures reaching 90, Dame normally wore only her hoop, a long cotton dress, and her “chemistry,” as she called cosmetics. For the skedaddle, she put on layer upon layer of clothing: drawers, her “old, pathetic corset,” a cotton dress with a Victorian support skirt known as a Bal-moral over it, a flannel garment, a dress that the regiment’s major had given her, and her shawl. She carried a haversack with bread, butter, and condensed milk and a bundle in which she had tied her best dress, a change of shoes, a coffee pot, and coffee. “It was no small load,” she assured Anna Berry in a letter. She was glad a box of dresses sent by Concord friends had yet to arrive because she could not have carried it. Dame, the stewards, and the sick squad departed amid the din of rattling wagons. They traveled at such a glacial pace that she feared the Confederates might capture them all, but she faced this danger with stoicism and even a touch of humor. “Well, let them come,” she wrote Anna Berry. “We have a long time been talking about going to Richmond. If they overtake us, of course, we’ll know the shortest route.”

What she witnessed that first day on the road – the great fires, the dreary slog of man and beast, the vastness of the retreating army – appalled and astounded her. “Oh Anna,” she lamented, “you can never dream of the horrors I have seen & it is well you don’t know what we do.” She could not bear the suffering of horses and mules that pulled supply wagons, cannons, and ambulances through the hot, dusty air. They had “little to eat & muddy water to drink [and] hardly a breath of air.”

She pitied the soldiers with her, too, especially after she and the men... covered only three and a half miles the first day. “Poor fellows,” she wrote. “It makes my heart ache to see them parading so sick.” While she had marveled at the flickering evening lights of a 50,000-man encampment at the start of the campaign in April, the actual size of McClellan’s entire army astonished her. “In all my life I never saw anything like the teams and troops,” she observed. “Really did not know we had a tenth part as many in the whole army. It is one of the grandest sights I have ever seen.”

On June 30, the party of sick men that Dame called her “little forlorn hope” stayed behind as their regiment joined the fight against the pursuing rebels at Glendale. When they reached that town, night had fallen and only the wounded, dead, and dying occupied the battlefield. Stopping at a farm, Dame scrounged cornmeal, milk, gruel, and meal cake for the men in her care. By midnight she was exhausted and “generally in need of reconstruction,” but the white women in the house said there was no place for her. A short time later, a young Black man found her a room with a bed in the house.

The same man woke her in the morning. “You’d better get up,” he said. “They’re going to fight.” While rushing to her sick soldiers, she saw that most of the teams were gone. Someone had left her and her party a wagon and ordered a sick rebel officer who was under guard to guide them to the best road to the James River.

The wagon joined an ambulance train, but when bursting shells panicked the animals pulling the wagons, she and her comrades stalled in a cornfield. Dame borrowed the teamster’s knife and began cutting corn and filling empty space in the wagon with it. “If Nero could fiddle in sight of burning Rome,” she decided, she could surely harvest corn under cannon fire. After the wagon started up again, she enjoyed a “short interval of peace and beauty” in a field of flowers before the driver halted again. Suddenly, Dame found herself staring into the eyes of a rebel picket. He tried to interrogate her, but when she evaded his questions, he marched her and her party off to his commander.

It is fair to ask whether her conversation with her captor was as spirited as she recalled it, but her account is typical of the spirit she projected throughout the war. “Got too far into Dixie, hey?” the Confederate officer asked. “No,” Dame answered, “not as far as I’m going.” “How far might that be?” “As far as Richmond.” He thought he had her now: “And going as a prisoner?” “No,” she said, “I am going under the old flag.” She correctly guessed that the Confederates had no secure place for prisoners. In the end, she and the others slipped away in the chaos of two armies on the move.

Dame soon reached the crowded camp where the Army of the Potomac was gathering to recuperate at Harrison’s Landing on the James. Of the sick men she had led across the Peninsula, only one died along the way. In the view of one private in her regiment, “it was to her devotion and inspiring courage that most of them owed their liberty and some their lives.”

‘A great neighborhood activity’: Outdoor hockey and nearly two decades of memories in Concord

By ERIC RYNSTON-LOBEL

Tom Philbrick’s basement has become something of a hockey sporting goods warehouse. Goalie equipment, sticks, skates, pucks – you name it, it’s probably down there.

Oh, and don’t forget about all the hockey pucks not in the basement.

“Hundreds of pucks around the neighborhood,” Philbrick said. “You find pucks from 10, 15 years ago stuck. I found them on my roof, found them on my neighbor’s roof. It’s unbelievable.”

It’s a little more believable when you find out that every winter for the last two decades or so, the outdoor hockey rink in his yard in Concord’s South End has held as many as 25 kids on it at once, including the entire Concord High boys’ hockey team.

Roughly 50 feet wide and 80 feet long, Philbrick’s gearing up for what could be his final winter setting up the slab of ice in his yard. He acquired the boards from Concord boys’ hockey coach Dunc Walsh about 18 years ago, and then held them together with rebar. A couple years later, Philbrick bought a bunch of plywood to frame the boards.

On the inside, a large sheet of plastic lines the surface like a pool. Every year around Thanksgiving, Philbrick brings out the hose, turns it on and lets it run, usually for at least three straight days. The ice needs to be thick enough to safely skate on.

The biggest challenge: getting all that water to freeze solid.

“You kind of hope you have a real cold spell where it just freezes solid because the hardest time is when it’s not sturdy enough to hold you to go clear it off,” Philbrick said. “You just kind of let it go until it’s totally frozen, and you can get on there and people can stand on it.”

Once the ice freezes, though, it’s usually solid until mid-to-late March.
Maintenance of the surface also takes quite a bit of work. The rink has a tractor gate for one of Philbrick's neighbors to ride over the surface with his tractor and snowblower to clear it off, especially after big storms. On more typical days, Philbrick will shovel the ice off after the kids skate on it, and at night, he'll run more water over the surface. "I've been out there on a lot of cold nights just going back and forth," Philbrick said. "I've had all kinds of different contraptions over the years, like hand-held Zamboni things. Now, it's basically just me out there with traditional hose and nozzle, or just free pouring right out of the hose.”

For Philbrick’s three kids, now 25, 22 and 19 years old, the rink has always been a sanctuary for them and their Concord hockey teammates. Even for the kids in the neighborhood who didn’t play hockey competitively, it’s always been a lower-stakes way for them to try skating and shooting some pucks on net.

“It was never like hockey training camp,” Philbrick said. “It was just, go out and have fun, keep the adults off the ice and have the kids just go out and play with a puck, tennis ball, whatever.”

But now, with Philbrick’s three sons getting older, the next year or two could be it for the family rink. He’s keeping it running this winter for certain, hoping to provide opportunities for the younger kids in the neighborhood to come try it out.

was very traditional for people just to come over and skate on it,” he said.
“For my kids’ age, I’m probably the last of the guys that are still doing it. I think everybody else is smarter than me, and they gave it up.”

March 2024 could be the end of Philbrick’s rink, but it’s undoubtedly served its purpose over the years.

“It’s a lot of fun, and I certainly encourage people to do it because it’s great having kids spend the whole winter outside on their own,” Philbrick said. “It was never about an activity to make them better at hockey, but naturally you do get better at it. I think it’s a nice change from the formality of going to hockey practice to just going out back and having fun.”

Tom Philbrick’s yard in the South End is where many young skaters learned the fundamentals and the fun of hockey.

ARTIST AT WORK

Story, Page 30
Ahmad Gazelle, who has a studio in Concord, finds a spiritual connection through his colorful pottery. It’s a skill he’s been crafting since college.

Geoff Forester
It’s a lot of work being a potter. I would say that I put my soul into it.

By GEOFF FORESTER and JONATHAN VAN FLEET

Ahmad Gazelle was like a soft lump of clay when he made his first bowl by hand at age 8. The small bowl crafted inside a little pottery studio in the Boys and Girls Club in Philadelphia solidified his artistic and professional future.

“I say that children and pottery have a lot in common,” said the Concord artist and owner of Rainmaker Pottery. “They’re both very impressionable.”

His pottery teacher glazed and fired his first bowl a brilliant cobalt blue. To this day, Gazelle’s cobalt blue pottery is his most popular.

Over the years, he’s become a master at his trade, traveling around the world to observe different techniques, study different pottery styles, and learn about every type of clay and glaze he could find.
Some of Ahmad Gazelle’s pottery in his studio on Airport Road in Concord. His pottery is known for vibrant colors.
He has lived in Mali, Senegal, Gambia, Turkey, Morocco, Malaysia, and Mauritania to name a few. When he was in Turkey he visited the historic town of Iznik, renowned for its finely detailed ceramic art.

He's known for his unique style, which stands out wherever he goes.

“What people like about my work – and they’ve said it for 25 years that I’ve been doing it – they literally say it’s the colors,” he said. “That’s what they used to say back in the 90s when that started, and they still say it now, it’s the colors.”

He strives to create majestic colors that are bright like the morning sun in spring. He uses different glazes to bring to life earthy colors, like the fading daylight touching autumn leaves. He uses his kiln, and different temperatures to conjure the colors he sees in his mind.

“It’s a combination of knowing your clay knowing your glaze and knowing your kiln,” he said about his work. “There’s a Japanese saying, ‘Know your kiln like you know your children.’ That’s because the kiln has temperaments. There are different atmospheres and temperatures inside the kiln. It might be there’s a sweet spot. There’s a cool spot and there’s a hot spot and it depends on what you’re doing, what kind of clay you’re using, what kind of glaze you’re us-
Ahmad Gazelle has traveled around the world to observe different techniques, study different pottery styles, and learn about every type of clay and glaze he could find.

Not long after his youthful talent as a potter hardened his resolve to keep pursuing his art, he took more pottery classes in college. The professor told him he was a natural. He didn’t choose pottery as much as it chose him.

“It was God’s will that I ended up being a potter,” he said. “It’s a lot of work being a potter. I would say that I put my soul into it.”

Gazelle has given others their first chance to shape their own piece of pottery just like he did all those years ago, including a session at Future In Sight, formerly the New Hampshire Association for the Blind.

The workshop confirmed his belief that “You don’t need to see to do very symmetric work with clay,” he wrote on his website.

He remains mindful and deliberate about his work and thinks back to a poem he learned about in college called “Centered.”

“Any piece, you start with a ball of clay, but you can’t shape into a vase, a cup or a bowl until it’s centered,” he explained. “And the analogy is that...

Brussel’s journey from food truck to festive catering includes holiday tips for hosting a dinner party

By SRUTHI GOPALAKRISHNAN

From its humble beginnings as a food truck stationed on Main Street in Hopkinton during the start of the pandemic, The Brussel, Emily Knowlton’s catering venture, has now blossomed into a thriving business.

The family-run operation initially started as a once-a-week offering of pre-ordered meals and has evolved into a catering service, extending its culinary delights to weddings, holiday events, baby showers, corporate gatherings, and beyond.

With a degree in nutrition from the University of New Hampshire and a passion for cooking, Knowlton paved the way for this family-run enterprise.

“We are a family that loves food,” she said, reflecting on their passion for exploration — be it in trying new restaurants, delving into diverse ethnic cuisines, or embarking on culinary adventures during their travels. That’s our favorite thing.”

Knowlton leads the charge alongside her “best chef” mother and sister.

The hallmark of The Brussel lies in its ever-evolving menus, individually tailored to each client’s desires. The versatility is striking — comforting Mac n Cheese for rustic venues, farm-to-table concepts for summer outdoor affairs — The Brussel adapts seam-
Amid their repertoire of culinary delights, the miso soy salmon stands out as a crowd-pleaser, said Knowlton.

The culinary journey at The Brussel spans the globe, offering flavors from Italian and Middle Eastern to Asian Fusion and African cuisines.

Knowlton understands that events can be unpredictable, but one thing she guarantees is delicious food. "The best part of doing this is when people are so appreciative and happy about your food," she says, emphasizing the joy of being part of those moments.

With the holiday season approaching, Knowlton shares her tips for a stress-free and fun party.

Cook in advance

Preparing dishes in advance can significantly reduce the stress of cooking, allowing you to enjoy the company of your guests, says Knowlton. Dishes like braised meats, pasta, or vegetables are heartier and hold well when made ahead of time, giving you more flexibility in managing your time on the day of the event.

Try something different

Creating platters with various options, like a snack platter, is a creative and social way to serve food. It adds variety and allows guests to sample different flavors. This approach can also be less time-consuming than preparing a traditional three-course meal, giving you more time to socialize and enjoy the occasion.

“Do not be afraid to do something different,” said Knowlton.

Avoid complicated dishes

Many individuals often opt for new recipes when hosting a party in an attempt to impress their guests. However, Knowlton suggests that sticking to family recipes can be a smart move, as you’re already comfortable with the process and flavors. There is a low possibility of mishaps.

“These recipes have some emotion tied to it,” explained Knowlton. “There’s nostalgia and that always comes out better than something you’ve never tried before.”

Use local ingredients

Incorporating local ingredients not only supports local farmers and businesses but also enhances the overall quality of your dishes. Local produce is often fresher and more flavorful, allowing you to create delicious meals without the need for excessive seasoning or elaborate cooking techniques.

Ask for help

Preparing a full spread for several guests from your kitchen can be a daunting and overwhelming task. So, Knowlton suggests people ask for help to make the cooking process more manageable.

“I think people try to do it on their own and I couldn’t do what I do without help,” said Knowlton. “I have a ton of help in the kitchen.”
THE BEST EVER
PASTA BOLOGNESE

Ingredients:
1 onion
1 celery stalk
1 carrot
½ to ¾ cup finely chopped pancetta
Olive oil
1 lb ground beef (80/20)
0.5 to 0.75 lb ground
pork
Salt and pepper to taste
White wine (dry)
½ to ½ cup tomato paste
1 bay leaf
Pinch of nutmeg
Chicken stock
1 cup milk
Long noodles or pasta of your choice

Directions
■ Pulse onion, celery, and carrot in a food processor until finely chopped.
■ In a large pot, brown the ground beef over medium heat, breaking it into small chunks. Once browned, remove the beef from the pot.
■ Add Pancetta to the pot and brown for approximately 6 minutes. Once browned, add the chopped vegetable mixture and cook until slightly softened (about 5-10 minutes).
■ Return the browned ground beef to the pot. Deglaze the pot with white wine, scraping the bottom to loosen any brown bits.
■ Add tomato paste, nutmeg, and bay leaf to the pot. Mix well.
■ Pour in the chicken stock, and milk, and season with salt and pepper to taste.
■ Cook the mixture over very low heat for 2½-3 hours. Ensure it’s a slow simmer, not boiling. The sauce should thicken and become rich.
■ The final sauce should have a thick, meaty consistency.
■ Serve the Bolognese sauce over your favorite long noodles. Enjoy your flavorful and hearty Bolognese!

Where Dairy Cows Grow

dairy cows wait, lined up in a row
in a barn, on the farm, where dairy cows grow;
they wait for the farmer to bring them outdoors
to a sky without walls, to a field without floors;

they live on a hill where their view is unmatched – the mountains are glued to the meadow that’s patched with buttercups, dandelions, big black-eyed susans;
to think that these cows have it rough – a delusion!

they are loved by their farmer in rain, snow, and gale, no matter the volume that fills the milk pail;
hear the loud bellows when farmer appears,
watch them dash to the meadow, devoid of all fears;

milk pail

dairy cows wait, lined up in a row pleased to live on the farm where dairy cows grow;
they wait for the farmer to bring them outdoors
to a sky without walls, to a field without floors...

The company we keep

“While some of the industries of our city are in fairly good condition, there are a few which have had a hard struggle for existence during the business depression of the last few years. It is to be hoped that this struggle is now over and that they will enter upon a period of long-continued prosperity.”

– Mayor Harry G. Sargent, 1901

Mayor Harry G. Sargent had great hopes for Concord on the fourth Tuesday in January 1901, and perhaps the most important hope was that the country had recovered from the economic panic of 1893. Prosperity of the city, Sargent said in his mayoral address, depended upon the “success, comfort and prosperity of the workingmen.”

The previous year had been difficult. The Abbot-Downing Company, crafters of the Concord Coach, suddenly and without explanation, transferred the ownership of the company. Concord Land and Water Power Company was in receivership, never able to recover from the floods of 1895 and 1896 and other fiscal strains. Although both forged forward into the twentieth century, two powerhouses of the community had faltered. One succumbed. The other stood witness to the century.

‘Crosscurrents of Change” Concord, N.H. in the 20th Century’

This 400-plus page hardcover edition introduces you to the people who helped shape a city, and it takes you through tragedy and triumph with some of the defining moments in Concord history. To purchase a copy or to learn more, visit concordhistoricalsociety.org/store.
Concord was affected by the twentieth-century global expansion of technology, transportation and communication. Electricity became available for commercial use in Concord before 1900 and spurred technological advancements in the production of goods. The increased productivity stimulated the local economy. Advancements in transportation lowered costs. Concord’s proximity to rail lines, the airport and interstate highways all further enhanced its evolution. The expanded availability of raw materials allowed ingenuity to blossom. Finally, nothing could have been produced and distributed without communications linking everything together.

Mayor Sargent may never have envisioned a century that changed everything. Innovations emerged in science, medicine, religion, politics, technology and culture. Society shifted and adapted. And through every minute of these hundred years, Concord toiled.

For at least one weekend in January, Concord is taken over by hockey enthusiasts and those looking to celebrate all things winter. This year, that weekend is Jan. 26-28. Intown Concord’s 6th annual Winter Festival is highlighted by an ice carving competition Jan. 26 and 27 that draws visitors downtown. The 13th annual Black Ice Pond Hockey Championships brings players and families to White Park for three days of action on Jan. 26-28, weather permitting.
